Santa Rosa, CA (December 11, 2008) – Wells Fargo Center for the Arts, Sonoma County's community arts center owned and operated by the Luther Burbank Memorial Foundation, has named its new executive committee and added one new member to its 18-member volunteer board of directors. Appointed as Board Chair for 2008-2009 is Joan Moyer Schwing, a Santa Rosa businesswoman and a six-year member of the Arts Center's board of directors. Also, newly joining the board this year is Don Wolff, Business Development Manager for the Press Democrat newspaper.

"Having been introduced to the performing arts as a child, I know how much they have enhanced my life," said Joan Moyer Schwing when asked about why she accepted the position of board chair and is willing to dedicate so much of her time to the Arts Center. "I support the Center, because I want everyone in our community to experience that sense of joy and enrichment." During her career, Schwing has led two genetic therapy companies, as well as a medical research team at the University of California, San Francisco. She currently runs her own consulting business in biotech management and business development.

The Press Democrat's Don Wolff of Rohnert Park joins the board this year as a new member serving a three year term. With an extensive background in marketing and advertising, Wolff brings relevant and valuable knowledge to the leadership of the non-profit Arts Center.
